What Is an Armada?

'Armada' means a fleet of warships. The famous Spanish Armada was sent to England by Philip II of Spain in 1588. His 'armada' was made up of around 130 ships containing around 30 000 troops and 2500 guns.

What Was the Reason for the Invasion?

At the end of the 1500s, Spain was a very powerful nation. They were at odds with England for various reasons (mainly religious) and England had helped Spanish rebels attack Spain's treasure fleet. Philip II of Spain was also very angry that the English Queen Elizabeth I had executed the catholic Mary Queen of Scots in 1587.

Philip II's plan was to:

1. gather an armada together of 130 ships;
2. sail to the Netherlands where the Spanish Army would be picked up;
3. invade England.

When Francis Drake took the English fleet to attack the Spanish while they were anchored near Calais, he used what are known as fire ships.

These were old ships that were set fire and sent to sail towards the enemy. This made the Spanish ships scatter and break their formation, making it easier for the English to attack the Spanish ships.

The Results

England rejoiced at defeating the Spanish and Elizabeth I commissioned a painting to mark the occasion.

England also remained a protestant country (rather than catholic) with the monarch in charge (rather than the Pope).

Britain also became a force to be reckoned with when it came to naval warfare, while Spain's superpower status waned.

How the British defeated the Spanish:

1. English strategy (hellburners)
2. Luck (weather)
3. Adaptable boats
